Education sociologists are interested in differential achievement by social class, ethnicity and also by gender. Although in such a context the term gender is used almost interchangeably with sex, gender more actually refers to the social and cultural norms and values associated with being male or female rather than biological differences.

In sociology, habitus is a concept developed by Pierre Bourdieu and refers to the norms, values, attitudes, and behaviours of a particular social group (or social class). The idea is often, then, associated with the idea of cultural capital and can also be applied to the idea of cultural deprivation and concepts such as immediate and deferred gratification and the arguments of Sugarman.
